MARCUZZI RESEARCH NOTES
TRIESTE (TRIESTE)
RONCHI DEI LEGIONARI (GORIZIA)

RESEARCH NOTES:

For many Italians, heritage has more to do with culture than borders. Indeed, some ancestral towns did not fall within Italy's own boundaries when family lines first emerged. Such is the case with Trieste — a colorful seaport town with a history all its own, nestled in a corner of the Adriatic Sea.

Before the Roman Empire, Trieste was known as Tergeste, crudely translating as “marketplace.” Over the last two thousand years, the city has held an important place as a center of trade and shipbuilding throughout the eras of the Byzantine and Hapsburg Empires.

TRIESTE — A VIEW OF THE HARBOR

At the turn of the 20th century, Trieste ranked as the fourth largest city in the Austro-Hungarian Empire. Only a bit more than half the population spoke Italian primarily. Europeans from all over visited and relocated to Trieste, with Viennese cafés and neoclassical architecture creating a unique cosmopolitan vibe.

Sigmund Freud made Trieste his vacation home. James Joyce removed himself from tumultuous Ireland to the seaside oasis of Trieste, and it was here where he began his masterpiece Ulysses. Shortly after World War I, Italy would annex Trieste while acquiring Slovenian lands. Unlike other annexed lands in the area, most citizens of Trieste had developed a distinctly Italian identity.

TRIESTE — PIAZZA DELL'UNITA'

During these swirling and evolving times, we meet the Marcuzzi family of via Lavatoio, 5.

On July 8, 1903, Leopoldo Marcuzzi and Emilia Soletti had their fourth child — a fourth daughter — named Bianca Irene Marcuzzi.

ENTRANCE TO THE ANCESTRAL HOUSE LOCATED IN VIA (DEL) LAVATOIO, 5

At the church of Sant'Antonio Taumaturgo, Bianca was baptized on July 30, 1903. Her parents named her maternal aunt, Irene Soletti, as godmother. In honor of this unmarried relative, Bianca inherited her aunt's first name as her own middle name.

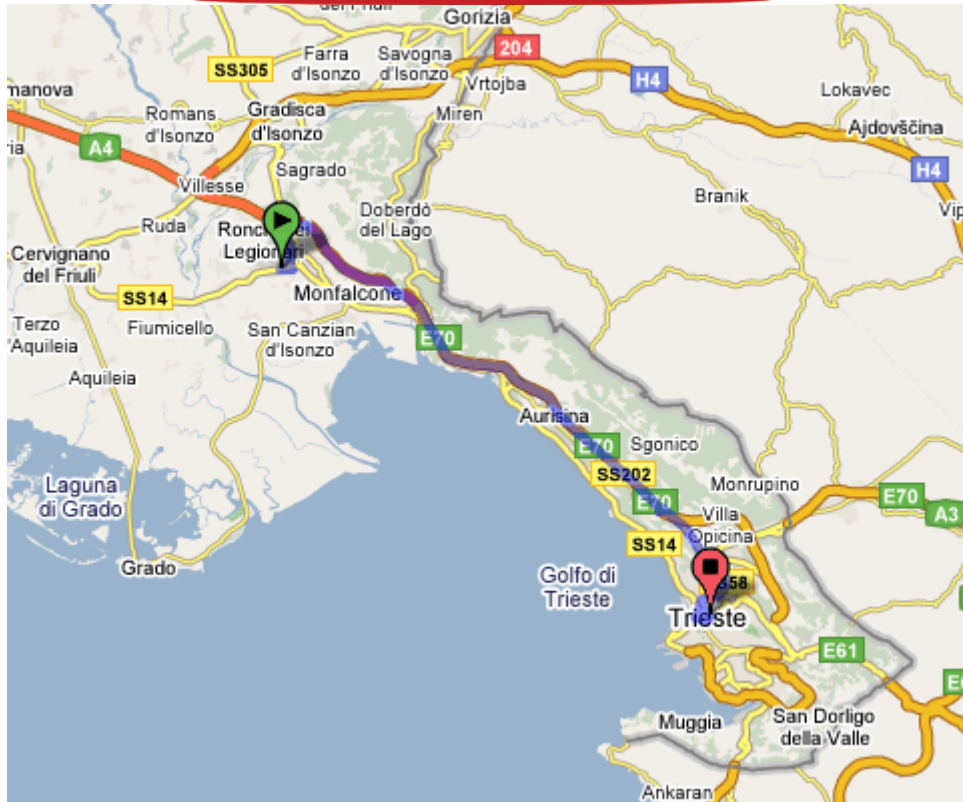

CHURCH OF SANT'ANTONIO TAUMATURGO, TRIESTE

Her mother, Emilia Teresa Giovanna Soletti, was born to two Trieste natives on March 15, 1861. Emilia's father, Giacomo, was a negoziatore or merchant. Her mother, Apollonia Rozza, was a housewife or casalinga.

Her father, Leopoldo Marcuzzi, was an agente di commercio or sales agent. Born on June 19, 1858, Leopoldo was the son of a cappellaio or milliner (hatmaker) named Mattia, a landowner from Ronchi dei Legionari. Leopoldo's mother, Luigia Cosolo, hailed from Ronchi.

Emilia's father met Leopoldo through business and introduced the two — they would marry on February 7, 1891, in Trieste.

A boy who was born tenth out of twelve children to a family in the province of Gorizia, Leopoldo had now settled in Trieste. He and Emilia were ready to start a family, some thirty miles south of his family's hometown of Ronchi.

Ronchi dei Legionari had changed hands of various governments over the years, but always maintained a majority Italian population and cultural identity. Part of the Republic of Venice for 300 years, Ronchi fell under French domination from 1797 to 1815. From then until 1918, Ronchi was part of the Austro-Hungarian Empire.

Ronchi's fierce Italian background played a pivotal role in one of the more memorable moments of Italian history after World War I. When the poet-warrior Gabriele D'Annunzio assembled a militia to protect the city of Fiume from being taken by Yugoslavia, the members were largely comprised of Ronchi men. The soldiers in this "Impresa di Fiume" were called the Legionari—immortalized in the name Ronchi dei Legionari.

The registers of the parish church (also known as parrocchiale) of San Lorenzo in Ronchi only date back from 1865, but the church itself dates to 1780. Unfortunately, older books were destroyed in a fire. We have information from 1834 onward, however, found in the second copies of those registers in the Diocese Archive of Gorizia.

CHURCH OF SAN LORENZO IN RONCHI DEI LEGIONARI

Mattia Marcuzzi, father of Leopoldo, was born circa 1816. Mattia's parents were Giovanni Battista Marcuzzi and Pasqua Cidulin — often spelled Zidulin due to varying dialectal forms of the time. Leopoldo's mother, Luigia Cosolo, was born to parents Antonio and Domenica Corgnalli. Luigia grew up in Fogliano di Ronchi.

We often must look beyond paperwork in the search for family history. The church fire likely destroyed many critical records, but we can find clues elsewhere by exploring the town itself. In the Ronchi cemetery, our researchers noticed only a few gravestones for the Marcuzzi family. Had the family lived in Ronchi for much time, surely more family members would be buried there.

In the nearby province of Udine, records indicate far more Marcuzzi family members. Mattia likely moved to Ronchi in order to marry his wife, Luigia Cosolo, whose family was originally from Fogliano — a hamlet of Ronchi. Confirming this, Mattia's maternal maiden name of Cidulin can only be found in the province of Udine, rather than Gorizia.

A careful examination of the details helps shine light on the story of the Marcuzzi family. While baptismal records and other such documents can often fill in the dates and details, we know more about the lives and occupations of the Marcuzzi ancestors.

Mattia, the milliner, designed and made hats at his store in Ronchi. A landowner, he possibly owned the store. The godparents to all of Mattia's children are also listed as landowners, mostly from the nearby hamlets of Peris di San Canzian d'Isonzo (province of Gorizia) and in Fogliano di Ronchi.

The Marcuzzi, like many families who lived in the border towns along the Adriatic, lived and worked during some of the most exciting and tumultuous times of the region. Their story is not only the ancestral tale of modern Marcuzzi family members, but part of the story of a town that became part of Italy during their lifetime.
